INTRODUCTION

This paper is the first in a series aimed at introducing the Church Agencies Network Disaster Operations (CAN DO) and its work with churches in the Pacific, in the area of humanitarian localisation. This paper will explore CAN DO's Ambae Volcano Response, which began in Vanuatu in 2017.

This response acts as a solid case study for discussing the strengths and challenges associated with implementing a localised, faith-based humanitarian response in the Pacific. It demonstrates the importance of the church's contribution and raises critical questions to be explored moving forward.

WHAT AND WHO IS 'CAN DO'?

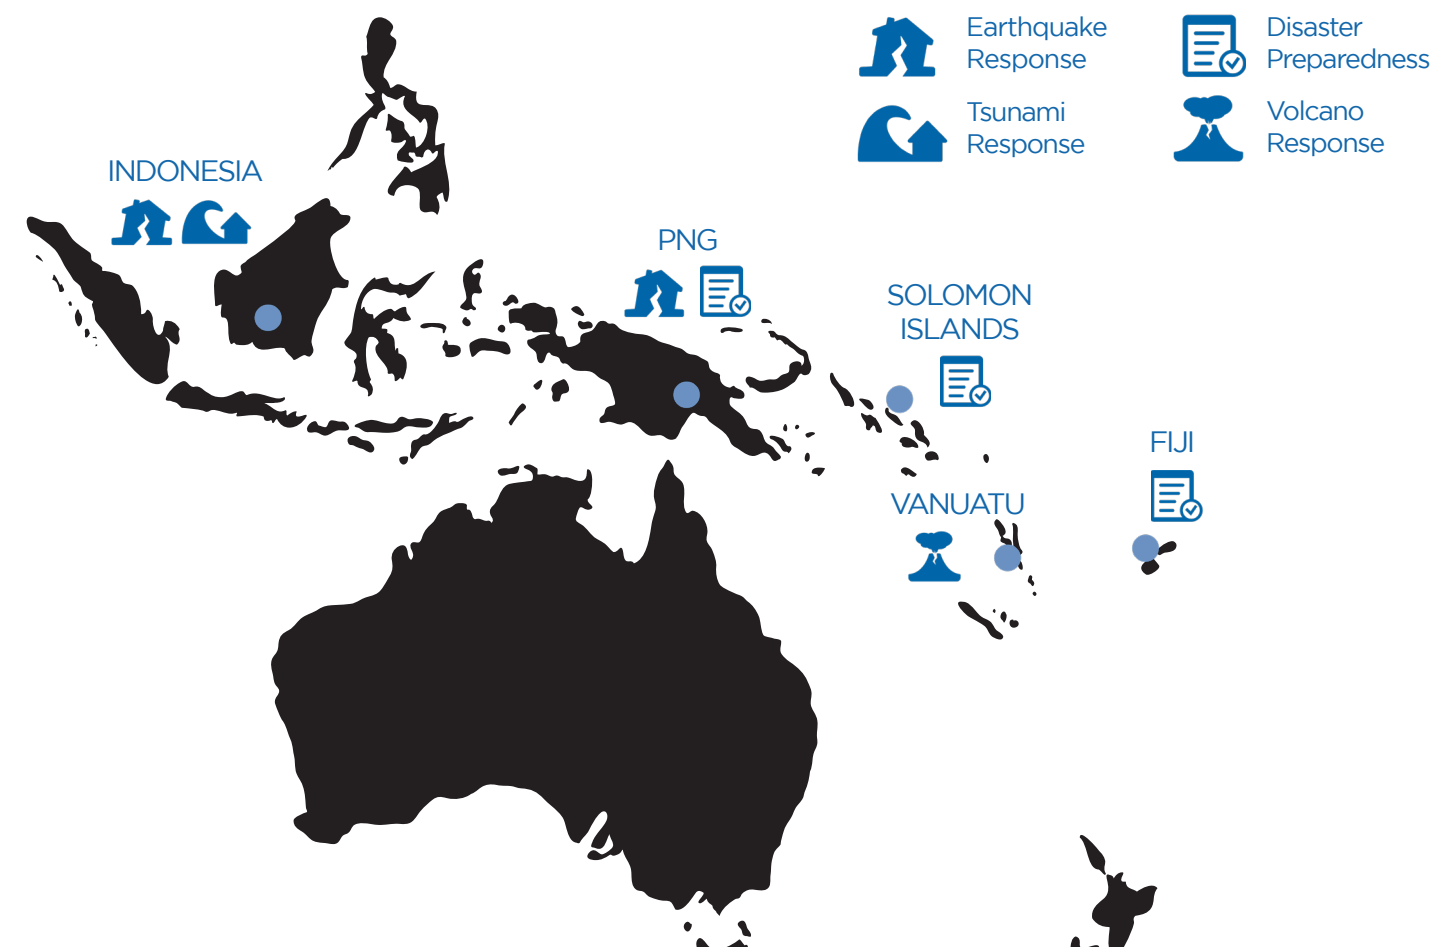

CAN DO is a network of Australian church-based aid and development agencies with long-established relationships in humanitarian and development programs in the Pacific region. Member organisations at present are: Act for Peace, Adventist Development and Relief Agency (ADRA), Anglican Board of Mission (ABM), Anglican Overseas Aid (AOA), Australian Lutheran World Service, Caritas Australia, Transform Aid International (Baptist World Aid Australia), and Uniting World.

CAN DO members are committed to working with local church partners and grassroots organisations to increase their capacity to respond to emergencies, as well as supporting them to build resilience and implement disaster risk reduction activities in their communities.

CAN DO is being supported as part of the Australian Humanitarian Partnership (AHP) Disaster Ready Program to build resilience in Papua New Guinea, Fiji, Vanuatu and Solomon Islands. The Disaster Ready Program is being funded by the Australian Government's Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade (DFAT).

CHURCHES AS POWERFUL LOCAL PARTNERS

Shifting the power to local partners is critical to the success of the localisation agenda

The Australian Government's Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade (DFAT) defines localisation as;

“recognising, respecting and strengthening leadership and decision-making by local and national actors in humanitarian action, in order to better address the needs of affected populations.”

This entails:

1. Building capacity of national governments, civil society and local communities to prepare for and respond to disasters.
2. Working through partner systems informed by appropriate assessments
3. Reinforcing local capacities during a response and ensure they are not marginalised by international actors arriving with their own staff, systems and priorities.
4. Supporting national and local authorities to drive coordination
5. Supporting women as first responders to crises
6. Supporting better coordinated regional approaches and operational mechanisms.”

Localisation Expert's Dialogue, 2019

We know that Pacific churches in particular have high levels of legitimacy and support in their communities and are seen as an essential part of the fabric of their society. Churches are often amongst the first responders in emergencies, drawing on their extensive local resources and understanding of traditional knowledge, leadership and cultures to guide their response.

In fact, the Charter for Faith-Based Humanitarian Action, endorsed during the World Humanitarian Summit, recognises the unique position and ‘comparative advantage’ of Local Faith Actors (LFAs) in humanitarian settings, particularly given they are embedded in local contexts before, during, and long after crises occur. Indeed, LFAs have consistently been among the top implementing partners of UN Agencies, such as the UNHCR, in delivering humanitarian response.

Despite this, there has been little attention given to the role of LFAs in localising humanitarian practice. Constructive partnerships between local churches and other humanitarian actors including NGO's will continue to be important to leverage local churches and communities in humanitarian response. This includes recognising the important role that LFAs can play in humanitarian response.

HOW DID CAN DO OPERATIONALISE LOCALISATION IN THIS RESPONSE?

In September 2017 the Manaro Voui Volcano on Ambae island in Vanuatu erupted. The outpourings of ash and gas damaged infrastructure, destroyed crops, livestock and impacted human health and contaminated water sources.

In March 2018, the volcano erupted again and for the second time in six months triggered a state of emergency and the mandatory evacuation of the entire island's population. Many Ambaeans pre-empted the second state of emergency and self-evacuated to the island of Espiritu Santo and as a result did not receive any official government support.

Humanitarian agencies were initially discouraged from responding on Espiritu Santo, in favour of the official government response centred on Maewo Island. This was despite the majority of displaced people (approximately 8,700) evacuating to Espiritu Santo. When the eruption triggered the emergency evacuation, CAN DO immediately became operational via its ongoing and long-established relationships with local churches in Ambaen communities.

The response aimed to strengthen pre-existing social support networks, including church leadership, family structures and women's groups that provide stability and social cohesion in times of crisis. This was primarily so that communities and families understood the risks and actively prevented children from being exposed to abuse, exploitation, violence, and neglect during displacement and repatriation.

Response activities were designed by ADRA and the Anglican Church of Melanesia (ACOM), in consultation with the National Gender Protection Cluster, in collaboration with ADRA Australia, AOA and the CAN DO coordination unit. The response was funded by DFAT through the AHP and managed by ADRA Vanuatu (through ADRA Australia) and ACOM (through AOA).

The expansive Church network enabled localised strategies to begin immediately, with the response locally owned from the outset.

The Seventh Day Adventist (SDA) Church (represented by ADRA Vanuatu) and ACOM Vanuatu are established LFAs who share the same worldview with communities and have significant influence on behaviour change and conflict mediation. LFAs have national reach, large established networks and relationships of trust with communities. Almost all of the impacted population of Ambae identify as either Anglican, Church of Christ or Adventist. The Church is a constant within their communities; the Church and their affiliated networks were present before this crisis (via church core activities and development projects) during the crisis and will remain present into the future, long after the involvement of most International Non-Government Organisations (INGOs) has dissipated.

This influence and trust saw the first two Leadership Summits (key activities of this response) reach approximately 3,850 members of the Ambae population. In addition, ADRA engaged with community members who were originally from Ambae to become members of the Psychosocial First Aid (PFA) teams, in order to effectively engage with and build rapport with the affected communities through speaking the local Ambae language and being familiar with local culture and customs.

“Local Faith Actors are frequently core to local systems of humanitarian response and resilience to crisis”

ADRA volunteer trainer:

“Ambae is my home island so, even though the communities were displaced and affected, having someone who knows their religious and cultural background allows them to express themselves openly and willing to receive the trainings.”

Collaborative and complementary; roles, resourcing, capacity and relationships

This paper also explores the difference in staff roles, resourcing, surge capacity and relationships with humanitarian actors between church institutions (ACOM Vanuatu) compared to independent humanitarian agencies owned by a church (ADRA Vanuatu). CAN DO acknowledge ADRA Vanuatu is a local NGO that is affiliated with an international network of offices. ADRA works collaboratively with local, national and international actors through a complementary process that strengthens local capacity to ensure quality, effective and timely responses to humanitarian crises.

Decision making and the country agenda is set nationally, and the international actors genuinely respect and support this model accordingly. The role of the international community is to continue to help build local capacity to ensure capability is in place for the national actors to set a strong agenda. This in fact, is CAN DO's role with all of its church partners, working towards LFAs being equipped to connect and capably support the national response.

Like all organisations responding to emergencies, the churches have to manage the tension between ongoing responsibilities and critical needs of communities after a disaster. With limited surge capacity and limited private or government funding to respond to emergencies, churches feel significant pressure meeting critical response needs during these times – particularly when responses are protracted.

LFAs have their daily responsibilities that almost exclusively do not involve responding to emergencies. When emergencies do arrive and a national response is required, there is the need and expectation for LFAs to divert from their daily responsibilities and contribute to the response. Without surge capacity, this means that daily operations are suspended or neglected, namely their ongoing development projects. Or alternatively, the church is disconnected from the National Disaster Management Office (NDMO) clusters because they are absorbed with their existing day-to-day operations, without time to dedicate to crises as they arise.

The lack of surge becomes particularly challenging when emergencies are protracted as in the case of Ambae. When the full and compulsory evacuation was declared through a State of Emergency mid-2018, and the Government of Vanuatu directed humanitarian assistance for evacuees to Maewo Island only, CAN DO did not have access to the additional financial support required for ACOM's response on Santo, heavily constraining the Church's assistance capacity and placing enormous pressure on existing human resources.

On the one hand this was a positive for localisation as the Church mobilised primarily through its own means, however it was also a setback as international actors were well funded, well-connected and commanded a stronger voice in the response coordination. Collectively, further impetus is needed to even out the playing field.

KEY RESPONSE ACTIVITIES

Key Response Activity 1: Leadership Summits

Four community-led Leadership Summits were held on the islands of Ambae, Maewo and Espiritu Santo. Managed entirely by ACOM and ADRA Vanuatu, LFAs became architects of their own approach. The summits included representatives from community leadership and established intra-faith collaborations, and allowed the sharing of information between different Christian denominations.

The summits mediated partnerships between community leaders, the NDMO and police representatives. Provincial government representatives appreciated the opportunity to meet with and present information to such a large scale and range of community representatives. It was the direct result of these summits that Community Disaster and Climate Change Committees (CDCCCs) were reactivated and Ward Councils formed to work with their Area Council Administrator in all aspects of disaster preparedness and response, along with the establishment of a Church Task Force. Representatives from the summits returned to their communities with plans for community engagement specific to locally identified needs in disaster risk reduction, food security and protection of women and children.

The second Leadership Summit focused on peacebuilding and was held to address the cultural tensions and conflict between relocated communities from Ambae and host communities of Maewo. Facilitators used theological teachings as an entry point for LFAs to critically examine the differentiations between biblical and cultural concepts of protection and inclusion, reflecting on adapted cultural traditions that may inhibit protection.

Community leaders from both relocated and host communities were able to move from strangers to a more cohesive community. Practical actions to foster peace building and reconciliation were recorded between the evacuees from Ambae and the host communities of Maewo to uphold peace.

ACOM have reported that all participants have concluded to bring about reconciliation and peace.

"Today I can see some light. I have been walking in darkness on how to properly cultivate my land but now I know. I now have clear direction for tomorrow with my Ambae families; I have plans to allocate plots of land to individual families. So, thank you very much indeed for these much needed tools. God bless."

"This way forward has been brought back to their [community leader's] respective camps for implementation to enable peace building. We believe very strongly that whenever their way forward is in its implementation process, both parties will live in peace and harmony and will no longer see each other as strangers and aliens but citizens."

Key Response Activity 2: Participatory Evaluation Planning and Design

The mid-term redesign and evaluation planning saw a focus on complementary capacity building. CAN DO provided technical assistance and ACOM led the workshops and design to ensure the process itself reflected localisation. Local collaborators were involved in the design at the outset and participated in decision-making as equals. Activities elicited participatory reflection, program improvement and organisational development. Evaluation planning through the workshop has been assessed as transformative, building capacity to sustain change – in both the participating organisations and in the sector more broadly, concluding the high importance in the strength and alignment of participatory evaluation planning with localisation in humanitarian response. Major results included indicators for measuring localisation in this response.

"Collaborative workshops have significantly improved the technical capacity of M&E (monitoring and evaluation) practices for Vanuatu implementing agencies. The localisation workshop and practice in evaluation techniques have both contributed to this."

- ACOM staff

Key Response Activity 3: Distribution of dignity kits, hygiene and protection awareness

ADRA Vanuatu volunteers implemented a dual-pronged approach in their initial response efforts. Volunteers met immediate health needs via the distribution of dignity kits while creating a soft entry point to build women's awareness and knowledge in identifying gender-based violence (GBV) throughout the distribution phase. The contents of the kits and distribution locations were decided upon by feedback from volunteers in consultation with the Gender and Protection Cluster.

Volunteers shared information on where women could access GBV services, including the counselling centre and local police stations, using the national referral pathway developed by the Gender and Protection cluster. As women and girls collected their kits, they were provided with the opportunity to share and voice their challenges and concerns, including health and safety issues. Volunteers actively engaged with women and girls, organising community awareness-raising sessions, educational one-on-one talks and group counselling.

Community women expressed their gratitude for the delivery of dignity kits, noting that shop owners had closed or stopped ordering sanitary goods. A group of teenage girls also said that their usual means of affording sanitary products, being earnings gained for gardening crops, was no longer feasible after the disaster. Women reported using cut baby nappies for sanitary purposes, however with water access shortages, women could only wash the cut nappies in the sea and hang them in full view of men and boys, who could see their "rubbish" as one woman said.

"Girls and women really need the items that ADRA are now giving us through these dignity kits to maintain our health and hygiene..Thank you so much for providing these kits to us in this community because you gave us some hope to continue."

Key Response Activities 4 & 5: Safeguarding Initiatives, ADRA Vanuatu and World Vision Vanuatu

As a disaster preparedness and resilience activity, ADRA Vanuatu had been training volunteers using a survivor-centred approach in the prevention of sexual violence and exploitation and the protection of the vulnerable over the past two years. During the Ambae response, institutions and systems for physical and social protection weakened as relevant officers and their families were also affected. Volunteers worked closely with the West Ambae Committee Against Violence Against Women (CAVAWs, established by the Vanuatu Women's Centre).

There were further breakdowns in community support systems and protection mechanisms when children were left on Espiritu Santo to attend school whilst their parents returned to Ambae. Volunteers divided into teams and worked with communities to develop community plans to reach all areas in West Ambae. The plans were comprised of gender and awareness campaigns, mental health and psychological support, Psychosocial First Aid activities, and child safeguarding awareness.

Volunteers also conducted three Psychosocial First Aid and Psychosocial Service trainings with 80 church and youth leaders. As volunteers have been provided with Family Life and GBV awareness by qualified family counsellors, they were able to guide teams to assess needs and concerns, particularly of women, girls, teachers and chiefs. Needs that were prioritised included water, sanitation and hygiene (WASH) and food security. Critical information was passed onto the Gender and Protection Cluster, who then also referred on to the Food Security and WASH Clusters.

"I initially did not see the importance of providing Psychological First Aid support to people in disasters, but going through the training, I now can make connection which I think it is really important in times of disaster" said one Ambae response actor, who has continued as a volunteer PFA Trainer with the Department of Youth and Sport.

Theology was an effective entry point to build capacity of local church partners and Christian communities, elevating social inclusion and equality by finding alignments between humanitarian principles, namely GBV, child protection and religious values. Similarly, World Vision's Channels of Hope program is an evidenced-based approach which aligns theological messages to societal issues, changing attitudes and behaviours towards women and family violence. Due to the success of the project in Melanesia, CAN DO commissioned World Vision Vanuatu (WVV) to facilitate this program during the response. WVV's training methodology, approach, and delivery subscribes to the localised mandate, with training content contextualised to address needs identified by affected communities and delivered to community leaders by ni-Vanuatu facilitators.

"Churches have made significant gains in areas of gender violence, and because of this, we feel confident to begin addressing awareness of LGBTQI rights with the same approach."
- ACOM staff.

The effect of this approach was captured in testimonials from participants:

"I have never heard any teachings about child protection; I would have taught my children and their spouses to be more careful with safety over their children, as well as understanding the importance of child protection, especially in times of crisis," said one Maewo female leader.

A community priest expressed the training's transformative effect, saying, "training has recuperated my strength through a spiritual wake up call for recommitment to my calling. I will work with colleagues on return to our campsite to put together a plan to do awareness activities and teachings, because together, we can build a strong and resilient community".

WVV reported that all participants from the Santo based training, upon returning to their communities, spread key messages through a variety of mediums. They had become champions and community trainers.

Training was focused on addressing the needs communicated by field staff and working with affected communities, however the poor psychological state of the participants was underestimated. Facilitators from WVV were initially faced with difficulties in delivering the training on Maewo due to the trauma that participants were experiencing. The training placed participants in a vulnerable position by asking them to reflect and share recent, raw, traumatic experiences.

This raises many questions: Does the accountability for this oversight fall with local field staff to identify and predict this consequence? Is the onus on CAN DO to provide stronger opportunities for skill development of field staff? Or alternatively, as the contractor of WVV, did CAN DO unintentionally control the power dynamic, limiting the local partner's freedom to express concerns about the training's approach?

Facilitators identified that a higher number of chiefs should have been included in the training as this would have worked towards mediating the three main systems of civil society: the Church, the chiefly system and government. While there was documentation of transformative behaviours, without ongoing mentoring, or refresher training, it is not known if community leaders will continue with the initial momentum participants gained to mobilise communities through advocacy efforts.

CAN DO may need to rethink the approach to short-term capacity development, instead facilitating ongoing opportunities for LFAs to practise skills and continue to build capacities on an ongoing basis. Albeit, such a shift would start with sector wide conversations and negotiations, namely with donors; as capacity building with large numbers of beneficiaries is challenging, with funding constraints and short-term implementation timeframes. This is an example where the need for greater synergy between humanitarian response activities and longer-term development projects such as Pacific Disaster Ready, proves vital.

CHALLENGES TO LOCALISING RESPONSE COORDINATION MECHANISMS

ACOM Vanuatu and local primarily faith leaders reported feeling disconnected from the country level decision-making process during the response. The perception articulated by many of these leaders, and in fact some ni-Vanuatu representatives from the clusters, was that the humanitarian response was being heavily influenced by international humanitarian actors. Other international participants told of the need for local actors, including churches, to not only participate in the clusters, but to have a genuine and empowered voice that represented the interests of their constituents.

This experience is not only related to the Pacific. ALNAP's State of the Humanitarian System Report (2018) provides a longitudinal assessment of the humanitarian system. Global trends indicate a general lack of coordination between agencies, poor technical competencies by actors and traditional international interventions failing to be effective but continuing to be used. The report suggests a need for humanitarian work to be built on practise, grounded in evidence and reflected upon in learning forums. CAN DO has taken this reflective and collaborative approach by continuing to engage across faith and secular organisations to strengthen the work of the Church and LFAs. CAN DO is also taking an auxiliary approach to localisation, supporting the Church and LFAs to complement and strengthen national disaster management operations.

In contrast to ACOM's experience, ADRA is a regular member of the cluster system and as such all activities, including the timing and implementation of activities, was undertaken in consultation with the Gender and Protection Cluster. ADRA was well connected with the clusters and other stakeholders responding to the crisis, working with the Department of Women's Affairs, the co-lead (Department of Youth and Sport) and also with IsraAid. ADRA had well-coordinated implementation of its activities with the Cluster Lead, the Cluster Co-Lead, IsraAid and the Vanuatu Humanitarian Team.

Upon later reflection, it became evident that ACOM and ADRA had some differing experiences and challenges during the response, with communication systems and channels between the two local implementing organisations as well as their respective Australian NGO partners an opportunity for improvement in the future.

"We are not clear on how the Church should be providing support because we are not connected to the cluster system put in place by the government."

THE NEED FOR GREATER SUPPORT AND SURGE CAPACITY

ACOM and AOA field trips to relocation sites during the early recovery period highlighted the failure of the official response to take advantage of the existing strengths of the Church. Consultations focussed on traditional leadership while failing to engage with church leadership. There were also reports that ADRA and ACOM could strengthen their communication, relationships and collaboration with other churches. Through the regional Church coordination unit, Vanuatu Council of Churches, the need to embark on coalition building and collaboration to increase the collective voice of the church at the national level and within the cluster system became evident.

As such, it is critical that other humanitarian actors, including CAN DO, support the churches' efforts to build their resilience, coordination effectiveness and surge capacity, while acknowledging their ongoing traditional church work in communities. For example, with the support of CAN DO members ABM and AOA, ACOM has appointed a local disaster coordinator within the Church. The most effective means of developing a support network around this role is being explored.

In contrast, ADRA, a standalone relief and development agency, affiliated and owned by the SDA Church has a designated Emergency Response Coordinator who works with ADRA and the SDA Church to coordinate effective and efficient humanitarian responses.

Questions around shifting the power and navigating the difficult landscape of a truly equitable partnership between international and local actors must be reflectively acknowledged and addressed. This response aimed for LFAs to be better prepared and more resilient as first responders. The foundations have been set to improve collaboration and communication between community leaders and government officials for further homogenous, coordinated humanitarian responses, with ongoing communication and engagement needed by LFAs.

Further engagement and relationship building is needed to enhance mediations within and between the Churches themselves, as well as with the chiefly system and government to improve dialogue and advocate for enhanced coordination in humanitarian responses.

"There is great value of collaboration in humanitarian response, and recognition of the value of intermediary organisations providing technical, financial, and advocacy support to local partners."

"We would like to humbly apologise for breakdown of communication with VCC resulting in non-participation during this (the final Leadership Summit) response. The general observation during this response delivery was that there is still a lot to be done by Churches in upholding peace, and the welfare of the Ambaeans as well as preparing for any future disaster," says ACOM staff.

SAFEGUARDING CHALLENGES

CAN DO observes recognised global good practice for beneficiaries and staff, acting within a mandate of inclusion and ‘do no harm’. This differs from some adaptations of customary practices that cause harm to women and children in the Pacific. During the Ambae response, CAN DO’s theological approach and safeguarding entry points to address this challenge connected spiritual wellbeing to overall wellbeing for communities; invoking faith as a strength that advocates for equality and justice for all. While there was evidence of short-term transformative behaviours after protection training and support from church partners, longer-term transformation needs sustained and widely adopted behaviour change, requiring many diverse messages that are ongoing and interactive.

Advocates for localisation call for ‘shifting the power’ from international organisations to local actors as a necessary, long overdue action that the humanitarian system needs to embrace. And yet, one of the largest challenges facing the localisation transformation is observing global safeguarding standards in contexts where they are not strictly observed by duty bearers, as well as the challenge of mainstreaming human rights within a non-paternalistic framework.

Some academics in women’s empowerment and gender in development, pursue the idea that ethical transformative change through external interventions that elevate gender justice can be facilitated. One eminent researcher, Professor Naila Kabeer (2019), explains that external agents can open possibilities and spaces for women, but external interventions and agencies must ensure they do not push their own agenda. International actors can provide a space that women otherwise would not have been provided. Women can begin to question social constructs. Kabeer advocates for an autonomous and self-governing space to be provided for women by external interventions. This school of thought has earlier roots, including Bourdieu’s (1997) concept of Doxa regarding cultural norms. Bourdieu explains that what is taken for granted and appears as the natural order within a community, such as oppressive cultural norms that do not change over time, is due to the lack of choices or possibilities presented or made available to that community.

Decreasing the risk of abuse and exploitation of females caused by adapted customary traditions was addressed during the Ambae response. Bourdieu states that such socially accepted injustices can only be questioned (including by women and girls themselves) when a new view is presented that provides choice and enables individuals to question their world order.

A similar approach was applied by CAN DO through protection training, local faith actors and theologians who used the bible as the vehicle to advocate for the elevation of safeguarding, protection and human rights. Communities were provided with a different interpretation of theology compared to bible teachings that have been unquestionably accepted for generations, namely, messages that promoted and sustained harmful societal constraints on women and girls.

CAN DO is currently undertaking and documenting a safeguarding review to strengthen the inter-agencies’ safeguarding processes and culture between its Australian member agencies. It will then work with Pacific partners, accompanying and complementing their work to socialise enhanced safeguarding practices. LFAs’ voices will lead and guide the process for their communities. CAN DO members and Church partners will collaboratively reflect on institutional approaches that have struggled to generate change, and emerging approaches that are leading the way to meet the rights and needs of the vulnerable.

While the sentiment of ‘shifting the power’ is not new, and ongoing research and evaluations are directed towards localised approaches, the international community is yet to practise all that they promote.

The Humanitarian Advisory Group’s (HAG) ‘Localisation in Vanuatu, Demonstrating Change’ Base-Line Report, assessed the level of evidence of action against localisation in Vanuatu. The report highlights the disparity between international actors’ perception of their transition towards a more localised approach compared to the perception of their efforts from local actors. Not surprisingly, international actors perceive their work as more advanced, effective and impactful compared to local actors’ perceptions, who reported international agencies’ progress at a much less advanced stage. HAG’s baseline study did evidence some momentum from international actors to provide more decision-making power to national and local actors. Unfortunately there was only limited evidence of actual activity or impact to evidence this shift, and the majority of ‘localised approaches’ were not systemic, but rather, informal and with limited scope.

IMPROVING THE LOCALISATION APPROACH WITH LOCAL FAITH ACTORS

The way forward

Reflecting on the lessons from the Ambae disaster response, a number of key questions have emerged that CAN DO will seek to explore into the future. Each of these will continue to frame the work of CAN DO with Pacific churches, to help the network deliver more effective, localised responses.

Questions for enhanced collaboration, accompaniment and synergy with long-term development initiatives:

- How to complement the work of the Church to better coordinate with government response efforts during humanitarian emergencies?
- What is the most effective and impactful way to support church leaders to use the best of local and international learning and experience, to drive good practice Disaster Risk Management (DRM) and community resilience?
- What best practice measures will ensure long-term use and local ownership of collaborative and innovative activities, designs and practices?
- How do we critically reflect on existing mechanisms for local partner decision-making power and ensure ongoing complementarity between churches and other humanitarian actors?
- How to improve methods to ensure the voice of marginalised groups are heard and incorporated into a response?
- How to listen better and ask relevant questions to improve meaningful conversations with local faith actors?
- What duty bearers can we connect with to facilitate work with Pacific churches that meet humanitarian principles without a top-down, compliance approach?
- What traditional resources and assets can be utilised to effectively accompany partners to socialise safeguarding measures in communities that adhere to cultural practices that harm women and children?

This paper proposes that when working with Pacific churches, the humanitarian community needs to take a strengths-based approach. As such, the CAN DO consortium is a good example of promoting localisation in the Pacific, where church partners are utilising their longstanding presence in the community to deliver effective coordination and response. In the case of Ambae, the CAN DO church partner response was driven by those who had a long-term stake in affected areas. Working through churches ensured the response addressed the self-identified, holistic needs of people affected by the emergency.

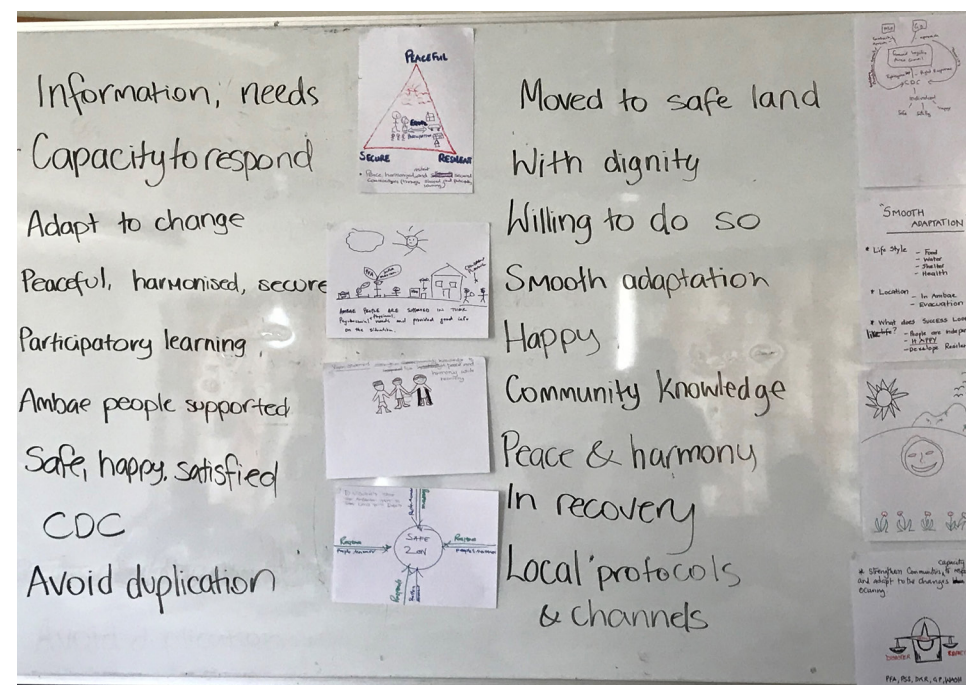

"Your continuous technical, moral and spiritual support has enabled a successful response which is unique because it's not just a one-sided response but people are holistically fed: physically, mentally and spiritually."
